INCENTIVE PAYS OFF—EVEN IN RUSSIA

Tetanus Can Be Serious When Preventive Measures Not Followed

K. H. SUTHERLAND, M.D., County Health Officer

Not a great many cases of typhoid fever now occur in this country, though it was a major killer less than half a century ago.

In California, for instance, the annual number of typhoid cases has not exceeded 100 since 1956. But when so many Americans travel in foreign countries where the disease is common, the chances are good that the number will increase. In this jet age it can hardly be otherwise despite all the precautions that are taken by federal quarantine inspectors.

For the fact is that most vacationists, when visiting countries where sanitation and health standards are considered reasonably good, fail to obtain immunization against the disease before leaving home and may therefore return with it. Yet when disease statistics are examined, it is obvious that some "safe to travel in" countries are really not "safe" at all.

THE LATEST official information discloses that, to date, 347 bacteriologically proven cases of typhoid fever occurred as the result of infection in the Swiss skiing resort of Zermatt earlier this year.

The number of cases reported has gone up and down like a barometer since the explosive epidemic first became public. Many were not included in the final official count, for, though many persons became ill, the typhoid bacilli could not be recovered from the fecal or urine specimens in all cases of illness.

The proven victims came from 10 different countries; 8 were Americans and 2 of these individuals were residents of Los Angeles County. Typhoid, as this episode demonstrates, is still a disease to watch.

IT TAKES FROM one to three weeks, with an average of two weeks, before symptoms of illness appear following infection with the typhoid bacilli. When traveling by air, this allows and abundance of time to do a considerable amount of sightseeing and still get home while apparently in good health.

In pre-antibiotic days, according to medical opinion, the Zermatt outbreak would have been a major disaster. Antibiotic drugs are extremely effective in the treatment of typhoid, however, and have greatly shortened the period of illness. Prior to their use, recovery in surviving patients used to take eight weeks or more, but the period of illness following infection is now considerably less and the mortality has been reduced from 10 per cent to around two per cent.

An attack of the disease affords a high degree of immunity for the person's lifetime. This is also true when the individual has so mild an illness following infection that it goes unrecognized.

TYPHOID FEVER is communicable as long as the typhoid organisms appear in the individual's bowel and kidney discharges. Some 10 per cent of persons discharge the typhoid bacilli for about three months after recovery, but in about two to five per cent of cases the individual becomes a permanent or chronic carrier. Such persons, of course, are a source of infection to others and are kept under the supervision of health officials.

Many individuals who have had mild attacks of the disease do not know that they are typhoid carriers. Such an unknown carrier was the cause of infection in the nine typhoid cases that recently occurred in Los Angeles County.

When known, the carrier does not present a community problem. Employment around food is not permitted, for the typhoid organisms enter the body through the mouth and careless personal hygiene on the part of the carrier could result in a typhoid outbreak.

TYPHOID FEVER does not occur very often in this area so vaccination against it is not generally considered necessary, excepting in the case of a typhoid carrier's family. The situation is different when the individual travels in foreign countries, or even in certain parts of the United States for that matter. Typhoid vaccine offers a good degree of protection, and should be obtained if the individual goes into an area where the disease is likely to occur.

A pamphlet on typhoid fever will be mailed to anyone sending a request to Health Education, L. A. County Health Department, 241 N. Figueroa St., Los Angeles 12.

Legion Sets Installation Of Officers

Installation ceremonies for newly elected officers of the Bert S. Crossland Post 170 of the American Legion will be held Tuesday, June 18, 8 p.m. The ceremonies will be held at the American Legion Hall, 1109 Border Ave.
